Negotiating Non-Recourse Carve-Outs in Light of Recent Court Decisions

Recent court decisions have brought into question whether borrowers and their guarantors can feel comfortable with the language in loan documents that lenders propose when the bargain made by the business parties is for a so-called non-recourse mortgage loan. This presentation reviews the recent cases and proposes language for mortgage loan documents that will remove some of the exposure-prone provisions (sometimes referred to as "gotchas") while at the same time keeping the legitimate protections that lenders need in non-recourse loans.
