The Green Code Meets the Black Letter

When it comes to environmental sustainability, companies are not only tasked with listening to the federal and state governments, they must also consider their stockholders, employees, and the communities in which they operate, not to mention general public opinion. In a climate where environmental regulations can change drastically from one administration to the next, finding a north star (and effectively communicating it) is critical. This is of even greater importance for the technology sector, which has the ability to simultaneously contribute to and help mitigate or solve environmental issues.
