Introduction

This paper is a revised version of previous papers presented at this seminar. Since the law is constantly evolving in this area, some of the updates are significant. If you have earlier versions of the paper, it might be best to discard them. The paper is written in outline form and is designed to get the practitioner started on their research when an auto insurance issue arises. It is not an exhaustive list of authority, but a starting point. One important caveat ... much of the case law that has developed in the last few years has been based on the standard policy. That policy was written by the Texas Department of Insurance, and it is still in wide use, but now there are others. It is more important than ever to read the actual policy in play.

Many people have contributed to this effort. My daughter and law partner, Jayme Bomben, has done exhaustive work, both on the original paper and the power point presentations that have accompanied this topic. My long-time legal assistant, Peggy Rothenberger, has helped a great deal over the years. I find myself frequently referring to the written works of Mark Ticer, Mark Kincaid, Tom Herald, and Janet Colaneri for reference. Finally, my colleagues from around the State have contributed immeasurably by their questions and comments, especially on the TTLA list serve. I appreciate all the help.

TEXAS AUTO POLICIES

Insurance is a great concept. It spreads the risk. For a certain price (premium) another accepts the risk of certain losses (coverage), for a certain amount of time (policy period) with certain limits (policy limits). Another way of looking at insurance is as a legal betting scheme. "Bet I'm going to have a wreck," says the policy holder. "Bet you're not," says the insurance company. Of course, in the auto context this wager is required in Texas. It's codified in the Transportation Code, as the Safety Responsibility Act.

Problems arise when a great concept is put into practice. Enormous amounts of money are at stake, so fights abound over when and how much of the risk is covered. In the legal context, insurance policies are contracts, and that's the way courts approach them. All of the contract elements apply. Consideration, waiver, breach, ambiguity, parole evidence - all of the terms that we see in other contract disputes, arise in the insurance context. But there are some differences. First, there are some base line statutory requirements that are unique to auto policies. Second, the auto policy is approved by a state agency, the Texas Department of Insurance. Consequently, that agency's interpretations of the provisions are sometimes considered in the dispute. Finally, there are some special rules of construction that apply to all insurance contracts, including auto.

Most of this paper discusses the personal auto policy, but some car wrecks are covered by commercial policies. Different rules apply to these policies. The basic commercial general liability (CGL) excludes auto wrecks, but a separate endorsement often adds it back. More often commercial auto policies are written as separate coverage under a package of commercial insurance. We have added a section to this paper on commercial coverage.

I. General Insurance Law and Terms

A. STATUTORY REQUIREMENTS FOR AUTO INSURANCE

The Safety Responsibility Act (found in the Transportation Code) and the Texas Insurance Code mandate certain coverage in the auto policy and prohibit some provisions. These statutes form the bedrock of auto coverage in Texas. The Texas Department of Insurance has no authority to act outside the parameters of the Insurance Code, however it can, and at times seemingly does, ignore the Safety Responsibility Act.

The Safety Responsibility Act only governs those policies that certify that they comply with the Act. As a practical matter that is nearly every personal auto policy, this distinction can be important. When trying to decipher whether a particular policy can get by with certain exclusions, it's important to know how these statutes interplay. This is a brief summary:

1. Tex. Transportation Code (Safety Responsibility Act)

Tex. Transp. Code §601.072 minimum limits

$30,000.00 after January 1, 2011

$60,000.00 for injuries per accident, if more than one person injured, for policies written after January 1, 2011.

$25,000.00 property damage per accident for policies written after April 1, 2008.

Allows deductibles of $250 per person injured or for property damage and $500 per accident under the liability coverage

Tex. Transp. Code §601.073 policy must contain

Name and address of the insured;

Coverage provided by the policy;

Premium charged;

Limits of policy;

Policy must state that it provides the coverage required by this section and that it is subject to this law;

Policy cannot be cancelled after a collision as to that collision;

Policy cannot require that the insured first pay the liability damages before the policy pays;

The policy, the application for the policy and any riders or endorsements consistent with this law constitute the entire policy.

Tex. Transp. Code §601.074 allowable terms

May contain a provision that allows the insurance company to be reimbursed by the insured for payments that are required by this law, but not required by the policy.

Allows prorating of insurance provided with other collectable insurance.

Tex. Transp. Code §601.075 prohibited terms

Policy may not insure against liability that worker's compensation is designed to cover.

Excepts domestic employees from this exclusion unless covered, or could be covered, under worker's compensation.

Excludes liability for injury to or destruction of, insured's own property

Tex. Transp. Code §601.076 permissive users

Owner's policy must provide coverage for permissive users in the United States and Canada.
