FATHERS, MOTHERS, SISTERS, BROTHERS AND OTHERS: SHOWER THE PEOPLE YOU LOVE WITH "TANGENTIAL" PLANNING

In the committed couple context, it has been said, "Don't leave the one you love with nothing but memories." To shower more than love on persons in both direct and tangential relationships incorporates new tools and new applications of standard tools – all applied to divergent relationships that may include, but go far beyond committed couples and spouses of any gender. Property issues or claims may arise out of tangential relationships as diverse as children born as the result of nontraditional reproductive technology to employer-employee matters. In a nut shell, this concentrates on negating some relationships, establishing others and providing for those that exist in law or in fact. In the lyrics of James Taylor's immortal song Shower the People, he advises that, "It doesn't take any sacrifice ... Things are gonna work out fine if you only will do as I say ... Things are gonna be much better if you only will." Today we hope to say enough that you will have some specific action items to help you plan for that tangential relationship that has walked thorough your office door – or is soon to find its way in.

I. INTRODUCTION

A. Disclaimer

The state of the law on certain matters which are the subject of this presentation are in flux, and the effect and consequences from entering into any agreements or use of any forms or documents attached to these materials must be considered only with individual research and based on the individual facts and circumstances of any given representation. Neither the authors nor the speaker opine on the validity of or make any guarantee of suitability or enforceability of any form, document or agreement that is attached to this article or discussed in this presentation. Ms. Hardie's materials on assisted reproduction and gestational agreements have not been updated since the article was first published in 2016, but are included to highlight that determining the status of a relationship can be a fact specific matter. The citations from Associate Judge Ruth Stiles' and Eric Bean's articles have not been confirmed. For the sake of space, most such attachments omit signature pages, most related schedules or exhibits such as property schedules, waivers of disclosure, ratifications, attorneys certifications, and attestations for contractual Wills. These forms cannot be considered "pirate-able" without customization.

B. Scope

Yes, it really happens. Some of the tangential relationships that are explored here have been actual cases presented to the authors. We first intended to update "couple" planning in a post-Obergefell¹ environment, but suddenly realized that same-gender spouses have the same planning needs as opposite-gender spouses — with limited exceptions; and that the planning needs of committed unmarried couples are not all that different from those rising out of other non-spousal relationships.

The statistical reality of the decline of marriage suggests that continued attention to the estate planning needs of committed couples is needed. However, because that has been addressed before, we expanded to consider new relationships – some not formerly studied, and some that have no ready definition. These "tangential relationships" require planning, particularly because there may be no statutory defaults or ready alternatives. Some relationships demand acknowledgment and some may need to be negated, but all may have to be addressed in some definite way – if nothing more than to fill gaps created by change in status or to accomplish certainty in what might otherwise be an emergency situation with no plan.

C. Terms and Limitations

A common relationship is persons of the same or opposite-gender living as emotional and economic partners without being married. In the past, Rhonda chose to call two persons living together in a close emotional and economic relationship, who are not married, simply, "committed couples."

Pre-Obergefell, Rhonda discussed two categories of "married" couples of the same-gender: those who are married and whose relationship is legally recognized, called "recognized spouses", distinguished from "non-recognized spouses" – those living in states whose law prohibited or did not recognize same-gender marriage. The later class of non-recognized spouses is history. Same-gender spouses are just that – recognized spouses. Some of their remaining unique planning needs are noted here.

In addition this article describes as one tangential relationship that of "children" conceived by artificial reproduction ("AR"). This is a pattern seen with increased frequency in our practices. We do not intend to address how to draft AR agreements, but include one – especially for those who have not encountered same in their practices.

Time and space limitations prohibit a thorough analysis of all issues in all classes of tangential relationships. The authors' goals are to highlight relationships that lead to estate planning problems and suggest solutions – in an effort to focus attention on special issues and special relationships. We offer a bibliography for those seeking additional research and understanding. Moreover, we hope to awaken a sense of the "new normal" – to encourage estate planners to be open to what they may not have worked on the past and to know what type of questions may need to be asked in the modern world of tangential relationships.

D. It Can Happen to You

As the authors prepared for this they began sharing stories - they anonymously disclosed to each other tangential client situations with which they had been presented or with respect to which they had offered planning opportunities. Property agreements for same-gender couples that transcended both *Windsor*² and Obergefell were discussed. Advice to same gender couples trying to have children through the use of donated sperm was considered. The most novel of tangential relationships were revealed – like a recent example of a family unit consisting of an opposite-gender committed couple living with the wife's former husband (who she divorced because he is gay) and a minor child, the biological child of the former husband. This is well beyond the Brady Bunch. But the relationship unit is not just family or couples – it may include other non-related persons ranging from employer-employee relationships to joint owners of all nature whose interests may deserve both attention and protection.

E. Demographics Prove the Point.

The breadth of changing relationships which are the subject of this presentation were exemplified the 2018 Trachtman Memorial Lecture given by R. Hugh Magill, Executive Vice President and Chief Fiduciary Officer of Northern Trust Corporation, at the Spring ACTEC meeting in San Antonio Texas. His presentation was entitled It's All In The Family . . . What is a family? Estate Planning And Trust Management For A Brave New World. The demographic statistics highlight the differences between generations with whom estate planners deal. They range from the traditionalists, who are referred to generally as the "G.I. generation" and as the "silent generation." Contrast this to the "Boomers" (identified as idealistic), "Generation X" (identified as reactive) and "Millennials" (identified as the civic generation). The types of households are staggering - married households are decreasing as nonfamily households and other family households increase. There is a huge increase in unmarried couples of the opposite sex. Author Magill describes a changing marital paradigm by comparing two models. The old model moved from courtship, to marriage and cohabitation, to children, and to financial security. The new model moves from courtship, to cohabitation, to financial security, to children, then to marriage. The variety of living arrangements with which estate planners deal is broad – including unmarried, committed couples, to unrelated co-parenting arrangements, to arrangements to create children artificially. Statistics gathered from the United States Census Bureau report "America's families and Living Arrangements" (2013) identified 35% of American Families as traditional (heterosexual married with children), 31% as households without children, and 34% as modern (blended multi-generational, samesex, single-parent, and others). What is obvious is that these demographics raise questions of how and to whom wealth will be allocated, how clients design for personal-care issues, and how planners consult about relationships and objectives in order to draft plans flexible enough to survive in these changing times.

F. When You Least Expect It – Or Need to Plan For It.

A premise of this article is that novel relationships must be honored as necessary, or negated when unintended. It is not possible to discuss tangential relationships with out noting that some relationships may "come out of the woodwork." One can have a spouse or children without necessarily intending to do so. Texas is one of the relatively
