Forward

We as a society have come to accept that polarizing political issues are a normal aspect of daily life. Our twenty-four-hour newsfeeds, Twitter accounts, Facebook pages and the like now constantly present us with our friends' and celebrities' views on such hot topics as the #METOO movement, gun control, legalization of marijuana and other issues. However, such political hot topics do not typically bring to mind Elder Law issues as the first point of consideration. The impact of these issues in the Elder Law context can and do have potentially devastating repercussions on seniors, particularly those suffering from cognitive decline.

Currently one in three seniors will die of Alzheimer's disease or a related dementia making it deadlier than breast cancer and prostate cancer combined.¹ And with Alzheimer's projected growth rate going from a current six million cases to an estimated fourteen million cases by the year 2050, we are on the precipice of a health crisis of pandemic proportions. As elder law attorneys, we are uniquely equipped to assist families and caregivers in navigating the health, housing, financial and legal issues that come with dementia, particularly when it comes to government assistance programs, powers of attorney, guardianship and general experience-based knowledge of what challenges these people face. Practitioners who have been at this for any length of time are rarely surprised by situations that the clients think are limited to their particular case. However, the same practitioner can overlook issues that, on their face, seem extraneous to the more typical issues, but that can have major consequences in many cases, including criminal penalties.

This paper will cover a few of the places where hot button political issues have intersected with dementia in recent years. Because many of these issues are new, the actual law and strategies in addressing these situations can be theoretical and untested. Specifically, this paper will cover how dementia impacts a person's ability to consent to sexual contact; ownership, possession and purchasing of firearms; use of marijuana; and operation of automobiles. Special thanks to the Alexander Collins and Kristen Ishihara for their contributions to the marijuana and automobile sections of this paper.

SEX

Introduction

Beginning with a study published in 2007 in the New England Journal of Medicine, research has been conducted on the prevalence of sex in older adults, including those with dementia.² According to that study most Americans age 57 to 85 have a partner with whom they have an active sexual relationship. In a follow-up 2018 study published in the Journal of the American Geriatrics Society, researchers found that the prevalence of sexual activity did not decrease with cognitive impairment.³ Having looked at sexual frequency
